BROOKLYN'S GANG OF MURDERERS.

While patrolling Columbia-street, Brooklyn, within a few yards of the spot where Officer Stone met his death at the hands of the Smoky Hollow gang, Sergt. Walsh, of the Third Precinct, saw Edward Glynn, one of the gang, acting in a disorderly manner. The officer placed the fellow under arrest. Glynn resisted, and a number of his comrades came to his assistance. Sergt. Walsh, who is a stalwart, muscular man, went to work vigorously with his club. However, the fight was unequal, and Walsh might have met Stone's fate if it were not for a number of citizens, among them his uncle, Frank Walsh, who ran to his aid. The Sergeant succeeded in holding Glynn, but could only arrest one other of his assailants—John Mungerford, brother of the two Mungerfords, one of whom the late Officer Stone attempted to arrest, and who are now awaiting trial charged with being concerned in Stone's murder. Both men were committed. Glynn made himself very active recently in getting up a ball in order to raise money to pay counsel for defending Stone's murderers, and he has frequently been heard to boast that "the gang" would get square with the Police anyhow.